

ORBI

and the Cloud Who Wouldn't Rain

On a dusty planet, everyone was thirsty: wilted flowers, dry rivers, weary animals.

High up lived Nimbo, a small, stubborn cloud who kept all his rain. "If I let it go, I'll have nothing left," he said.

Orbi and Chispa climbed up to him in their tin rocket.

"Hello, Nimbo," said Orbi. "Everyone below is thirsty. Won't you share a single drop?" "Not one! It's mine."

"What if I show you a secret of water?" said Orbi. "Just let one drop fall. A tiny one."

Nimbo let a single drop fall. It landed on a wilted flower... and the flower opened its petals. "You see? What you share never runs out."

Nimbo was surprised: he still had almost all his water, and below there was already a happy flower.

Encouraged, he let a soft rain fall. The rivers sang, the animals drank, the children splashed.

And then the sun warmed the puddles, the vapor rose to the sky... and Nimbo filled up with water again. "It came back to me!" "What you share never runs out."

Nimbo understood: the water you give away isn't lost; it returns as rain, again and again.

01F
499

"Your water wasn't for keeping," said Orbi. "It was for growing life."

Nimbo grew big and generous, a brilliant blue, spreading rain wherever it was needed.

The planet bloomed: green, fresh, and full of laughter. "Thank you, Nimbo!"

Tonight, if you have something lovely, remember what Orbi whispers: what you share never runs out.

"what you share never runs out"

THE END