

ORBI

and the Seed in a Hurry

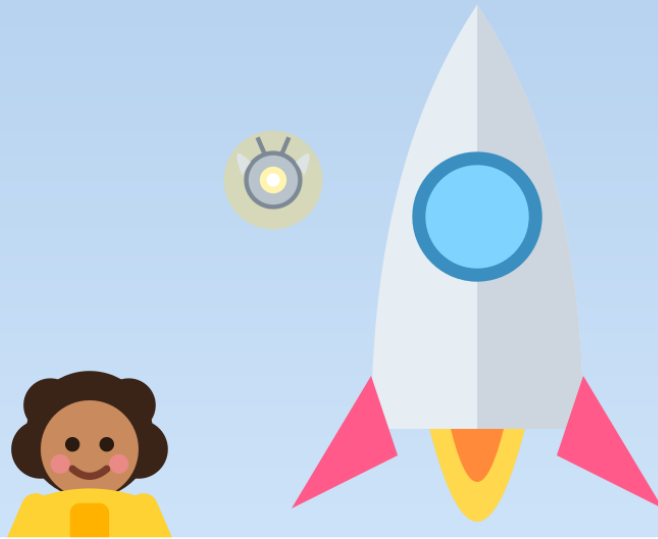

On a planet of bare earth, nothing grew. There was only dust and silence.

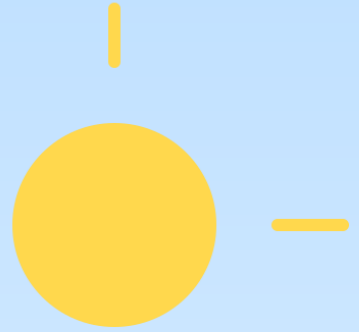

Under the ground slept a seed named Brote. "I want to be a huge tree, and I want it NOW!" she grumbled.

Orbi and Chispa landed and heard her little voice beneath the soil.

"Hello, Brote," said Orbi. "Why are you so cross?" "I push and push, but I don't grow all at once. I give up!"

"Big things grow slowly," said Orbi. "Shall we try together, day by day?"

On the first day they gave her a drop of water and a ray of sun. Almost nothing happened... but a tiny green tip peeked out. "You see? With patience, everything grows."

Brote wanted more, but Orbi smiled: "A little each day. Hurry doesn't make trees."

The days went by. A stem. Then a leaf. Then another. Brote waited... and grew.

One morning, Brote was already a strong little plant with flowers. "I did it, without giving up!" "With patience, everything grows."

Brote understood: what matters doesn't arrive all at once; it comes by watering it a little each day.

"Your tree wasn't far away," said Orbi. "It was growing inside you, slowly."

The seasons turned and Brote became a big tree, green and full of nests.

In its shade the children played and the animals rested. The whole planet turned green again.

Tonight, if something lovely is slow to arrive, remember what Orbi whispers:
with patience, everything grows.

"with patience, everything grows"
